Teach and Repeat: Boughers Make PFW a Family Tradition

An untraditional student who didn't graduate from college until her early 40s, Staci Bougher loved bringing her young children to the place where she was earning her degree. Starting when Genevieve was 3 and Ben was 1, they met all of Mom's professors and enjoyed being on the campus of Purdue University Fort Wayne.

"I wanted them to be comfortable on a big campus and not have the idea of, 'I can't go to a big college because it would be a scary place,'" Bougher said. "My kids are my life, so my professors knew all about them because I would have them interact as often as was reasonable."

Bougher graduated in 2011 and worked as a family lawyer for a decade before deciding she needed a change. Shortly after, Mike Wolf, chair of PFW's Department of Political Science, asked if Bougher might be interested in teaching an intro to peace and conflict class. After all, she was very educated, had taken classes from faculty such as Georgia Ulmschneider and James Toole, and was comfortable speaking in front of people.
