

Question Time

Last year, in part as a result of the collaboration during the Fall Break Bus Trip, there was a survey done about food options on campus. The results of the survey, combined with the fact that the contracts of the current food vendors on campus were expiring at the end of this year, led to the exploration of the possibility of diversifying food options on campus, perhaps in the form of a cafeteria. So far, there have not been any announcements about progress of this matter.

Instead, in a recent Journal Gazette article about the bridge linking IPFW and Ivy Tech, John Kaufeld was quoted talking about the possibility of IPFW students “making the trek across the 3, 667-foot bridge for the vaunted Ivy Tech cafeteria” since [Ivy Tech] has a very nice student-run cafeteria.”

<http://www.journalgazette.net/article/20140919/LOCAL/309199991>) Is this an indication that the plans for a cafeteria have been abandoned, and IPFW is going to continue to only have Pizza Hut, Subway, and Taco Bell as its food choices on campus, unless they want to make the trek across the not-yet-building bridge?

Since the survey revealed a very strong interest in having more diverse and healthier food options on campus, it would be great if we could have an update on the process.

Ann Livschiz
Department of History